um, so basically if you think about the way information flows it's kind of like this big stream..... I mean, uh, the professor was saying something about the cognitive load theory, which is really important... well, let me find that part... yeah, so when you're trying to process too much it's like a bottleneck... and then the key idea here is... uh, where was I... oh, right, the forgetting curve is exponential, so you need to reinforce... and so that way you're in currently concept, then some you're done used for the processing load country, chance up enad... and later, like,, something is up to to and now... its extremely lie, I-mave th you're graaes, increased, in the other task, you've even shater ins... more from... so where beyond a force and process for mze it's most usually, so no'me waone sperning sound it's like a bottleneck. he teach on:WJGza one, obileutly aniteana as its func time... uh,, mean, if you have in format on searing for them passion, however, uh, prevent, cognitive proccessing... yeah, so when you're and impentbating to stead, romuch it's nus like a bottleneck...so it's ink a bottleneck... and then the key idea here is... uh, where was I... oh, right, the forgetting curve is exponential, so you need to reinforce...

Cognitive Load & Retention: The Core Principles

- 1. Information Processing Bottleneck: Human working memory is limited; excessive information leads to cognitive overload.
- 2. The Forgetting Curve: Knowledge retention decays exponentially without active reinforcement.
- 3. Active Recall Strategy: Practice retrieving information to strengthen neural pathways.
- 4. Spaced Repetition: Review material at increasing intervals to counteract forgetting.
- 5. Interleaving: Mix different topics during study to improve long-term transfer.

Key Analogy: Think of working memory like a small bucket. If you pour too much water (information) in at once, it overflows and is lost. To save the water, you need to pour it into a larger tank (long-term memory) using a steady, measured approach (active recall & spaced repetition).
